Jeb Bush's campaign strategy got a significant boost late Friday when the Florida Republican landed a lucrative corporate endorsement that provides him with coveted free media airtime and visibility. Bush said at a news conference that he will continue to run "decisively," and said he has "no plans" to drop out of the race for the GOP nomination. It was his first public appearance after the surgeon general's advisory committee released a report urging that the U.S. postpone full implementation of a plan to encourage the public to exercise more. "I'm running a campaign that is a steady, steady course," he said. [T]his is a moment of uncertainty. But I am running a campaign with conviction. Bush said the committee's decision, in an August 17 letter, was not a factor in his decision to join its advisory board. Bush has the support of influential advertising giant WPP. With a network of agencies that are members of WPP, the company is a top player in the media world. It is not unusual for the company to throw its weight behind a campaign for a high-profile incumbent, such as, for example, Vice President Joe Biden. Biden, an early endorser of Bush, has the full support of the company. WPP is also a big backer of the National Rifle Association, although it has stopped advertising on Fox and National Rifle Association television advertising after the Newtown, Conn. shootings in December. The association is important to Bush, who is a prominent figure on Capitol Hill from his time as Florida governor and as the son of former President George H.W. Bush. Bush said the
